Down but not out, Sussex seeks comeback

Fred Hazel people and places

There were lots of reasons to visit Sussex in the old glory days before they had big-scale employment industries like the potash mines. We'd think nothing of driving from Saint John just to pick up an ice cream cone at the dairy, or some Sussex-produced butter or the famous Sussex Golden Ginger Ale, when it was bottled there.

Sussex struck me as an idyllic rural town where it would be a delight to live. On Main Street, I'd drop in to the Kings County Record, to visit Donald R. Smith, who gave me my first journalism job at the Telegraph-Journal. Later, in semi-retirement, he took over as editor of the Record.

The women liked to check out the bargains at the former Black's Clothing, just a few doors down from the Record office. We'd ramble around town, sampling the restaurants, including the Gasthof Old Bavarian at nearby Knightville, and enjoying the charm of Sussex streets with homey names like Church Avenue.

A big attraction in later years was the weekly Farmers' Market, with its country-fresh variety of produce and crafts displayed in a friendly environment. And the imaginative wall murals gave Sussex its own distinctive décor.

Sussex moved into the industrial big-time with the discovery of potash deposits for agricultural fertilizer. You couldn't drive past on the highway without noticing those tall mine-shaft towers dominating the bucolic skyline. Now that dream of industrial security has been shattered by world market forces beyond the town's control, bringing an end to the promising potash production.

It's devastating that some 430 direct good-paying jobs, along with a lot of ancillary support work, is gone as the brand-new Picadilly mine shuts down, replaced by Saskatchewan-based production. But Sussex has a history of adapting. The once-famous ginger ale factory, dating back to 1910, was re-purposed as a housing project.

Mayor Marc Thorne sees "a ray of hope" in such projects as the major job fair recently held in town by J.D. Irving, Limited, seeking to recruit 3,700 skilled workers to fill various job vacancies due to retirements and business growth. Potash Corps is contributing to Sussex charities, providing training funds for displaced miners and seeking to renew its mining licence for possible future activity.

Talk of a regional airport has resurfaced, based on the idea that foggy flight-disruptions at Saint John airport do not prevail in centrally-located Sussex. Perhaps some federal or provincial office operations might be re-located to the Sussex area. No one has the one big solution that can restore the former "Dairy Town's" fortunes yet. But Sussex does have two important things going for it.

They are the history of its small-town determination and the upbeat spirit of its people. Officials at all levels of government need to be looking out for opportunities to restore prosperity to this model town set in the rolling hills and rich farmlands of Kings County.

The economy is uncertain, but it's in all New Brunswickers' interest that Sussex finds a way of bouncing back.
